A Constituent's Guide to the Albany Common Council, Part 9: Aging

Each month, we'll go back to basics on all things Common Council.

Like fine wines and cheeses, legislation gets better with age. In fact, with some exceptions, it has to: Municipal Home Rule Law and Article 4 of the Common Council's Rules and Procedures spell out the length of time certain pieces of legislation must age before they can be considered for a vote.

These rules are mostly concerned with local laws, which must appear "in [their] final form and upon the desk of the members" at least seven days prior to their passage, excluding Sunday. So councilmembers and constituents must be given at least a week to review local laws—including any amendments—before the Council can vote on them. This is true except in rare circumstances: The Mayor retains the power to attach a message of necessity to a law and ask for its immediate consideration. But as we learned in February's newsletter, this law would need a 10-member majority to pass.

While aging rules don't apply to the Council's ordinances, these pieces of legislation are still best served with ample time for digestion. To encourage councilmembers to give their colleagues and the public time for review, ordinances voted upon at the meeting of their introduction must pass by unanimous consent.

Resolutions need not age, and many pass at the meeting of their introduction. You can find more on the legislation currently before the Council in our Agenda Center.
